

The role of students from developing countries in the internationalization & their importance in the development policy context

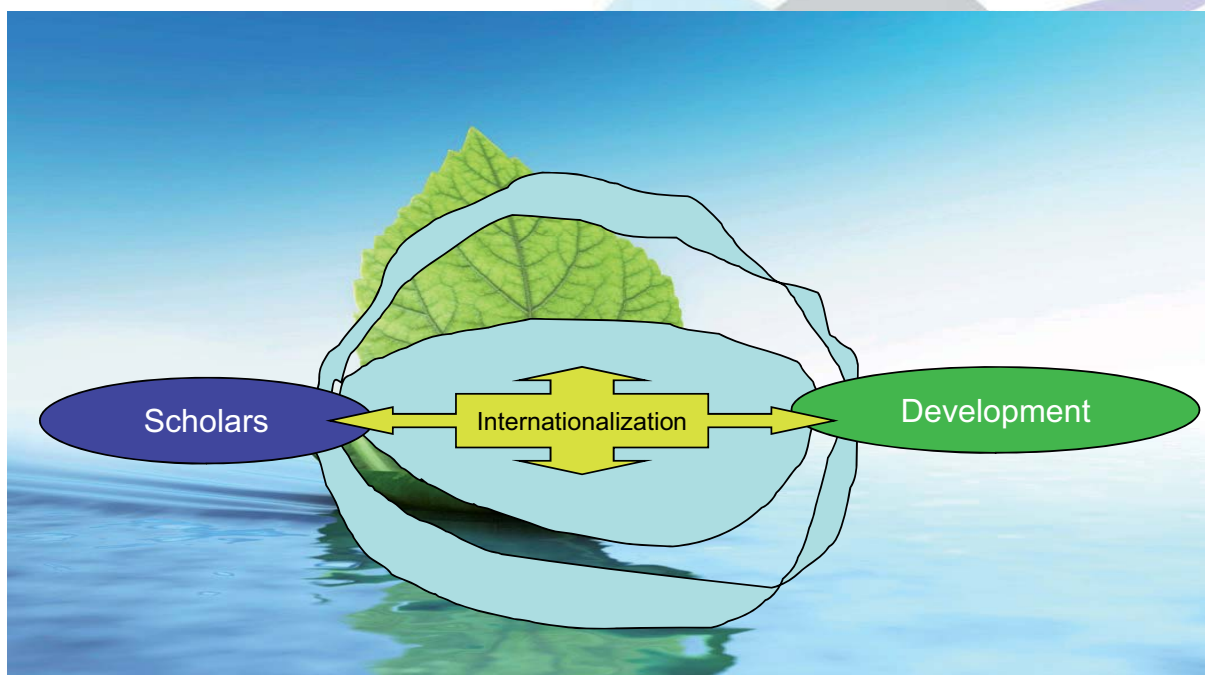

Kalpana Giri

PhD Scholar,
University of BOKU, Vienna
North-South Dialogue Program

Presentation at the Conference "Internationalisation and development policy dimensions at universities and universities of applied sciences" at Vienna on April 16-17, 2009

Life is a Learning process...

Diversity means both - Challenges and Achievements

Internationalisation - A learning process

First-hand experiences with-

- Knowledge and techniques using emic and etic approach
- Teaching style, GURU relations
- Research and Documentation
- Mutual sharing of experiences, culture
- Extended contacts, affiliation and networks to international society
- Learning & building up on parallel projects, best practices etc
- Varied culture, adaptive understanding about how science can play a different role in a different context
- A global positioning of the self
- Many more...

Development - Applied (Learning) platform

A scholar can be an important Resource as:

- A network contact
  - Sharing of information/opportunities/collaboration
  - Creating forums for dialogue and mutual action
  - Building research networks
- An administrative
  - Knows pertinently on what works and how to make it work
- A “cultured,, researcher/scholar with cultural adaptive sense
  - New perspectives on problem-management
  - Emerging concepts into research
  - Research on issues that can negotiate or provide new directions to existing policy

My experiences as a scholar

Professional front:

- Information acquisition & sharing
- Building contacts, networks & collaboration
- Highly policy and development related research
- Documentation and dissemination of research findings

Personal front:

- Opportunity, Exposure, Allies
- Removal of financial constrain for personal development
- Understanding about culture diversity in various dimensions
- Enhanced skills, Capacity development

Future plans

- Build research through collaboration, contribute to policy and development

Summing up...

Happy Nepali New Year 2066 B.S.

Thank you!!!

